Ask the Expert

Q: Is stress silently affecting your health?

A: While stress is a universal experience, its transition into a daily fixture can impact far more than just our emotional state. Persistent tension may interfere with sleep, digestive function, energy levels, mental clarity, appetite, and even our immune system. It is often suggested to begin by nourishing your body from within using whole, nutrient-dense foods, maintaining stable blood sugar, and prioritizing restorative rest, physical activity, and relaxation. Beyond these foundations, specific supplements can offer further assistance. Magnesium is beneficial for promoting relaxation and supporting healthy nerve function, while B vitamins and Omega-3 fatty acids provide vital nourishment for the brain and nervous system. Adaptogenic herbs like ashwagandha, rhodiola, and holy basil assist the body in managing daily stressors, and L-theanine can help foster a sense of calm and focus. Although stress is unavoidable, the way you support your body can significantly influence your well-being. Consistent, small habits are key to building resilience and fostering lasting health.
